FORT PRINCE GEORGE (1753-1768)

Situated on the Keowee River in the Carolina backwoods, Fort Prince George was built by the British in order to protect the traders with the Indians and to deter French intrusions into the western reaches of South Carolina. This remote, military outpost was directly across the Keowee River from Keowee Town, the Lower Cherokees' principle settlement in what today is the westernmost tip of South Carolina. Thus, British soldiers stationed at the fortress were able to keep a watchful eye on activities of the Indians as white settlers pressed relentlessly toward Cherokee lands.

Plan of the Fort

Shown above is the plan of Fort Prince George. The plan was based upon archeological studies by John D. Combes of the University of South Carolina. The fort was put up in 1753 when the aggressive Governor James Glen of South Carolina personally led an expedition into the Lower Towns of the Cherokee Indian Nation and supervised the construction of the fortress. Fort Prince George served as a major colonial outpost for the protection of English traders until 1768. The fort stood near the Keowee River not far from the old Indian town of Keowee. Until Lake Keowee was constructed, the fort's former location was eleven miles south-southwest of the town of Pickens. But the site of Fort Prince George now lies under water.

Fort Prince George

Logan's history of Upcountry South Carolina says it was built in the form of a square, with a rampart wall of earth six feet in height, on which wooden stockade log walls were fixed; a ditch, and natural bluffs strengthened the sides of it, and each corner had strong bastion angles upon which were mounted 16 small cannons, four on each bastion. Its barracks were sufficiently spacious for the hundred men. The fort was built in 1753, across the Keowee River and "within gunshot distance" of the Indian town of Keowee. The fort was on the east bank and Keowee town was on the west side. The fort was about 50 yards from the river on a level field which ran about 300 yards wide and a mile in length along the Keowee before the nearby hills closed in. It lay between Mile Creek and the river. (Sketch by Jerry Alexander, 1989)

England's red, white and blue first Union Jack was displayed atop the flagpole at Fort Prince George. It was also proudly exhibited by many early British explorers and settlers in North America.

In 1760, Indians murdered Lieutenant Cotymore, the British commander of the fort. Then, the garrison's soldiers fell upon a group of Cherokee hostages and slaughtered all of them. That event led to the Cherokee War.

War Chief Ostenaco of the Cherokee Nation

By Charles H. Busha

The image of Ostenaco depicted above was based on a portrait painted in 1762 by the famous artist Sir Joshua Reynolds. This Cherokee leader was also known as Outacity, Man Killer and Judd's Friend. He was pro-British—but too old to fight for them during the Revolutionary War. His legacy is that of a noble Native American who attempted under overwhelming odds to keep peace with the whites as they chiseled away the Cherokees' territory. In 1721, General Francis Nicholson (1655-1728), South Carolina's first colonial governor, called a conference with headmen from thirty-seven Indian settlements. The governor then recognized Ostenaco as an honorable and trustworthy representative of his tribe. A land-abdicating treaty with the Cherokees was signed at the conference, and fifty square miles of the tribe's land was ceded to the colony. During the French and Indian War, Ostenaco and his warriors joined Colonel George Washington's forces in Pennsylvania and then fought the French and their Indian allies there. Then, in 1760, Ostenaco led a fierce attack on Fort Loudoun in Tennessee. That fort was a counterpart in Tennessee of Fort Prince George in Carolina. Ostenaco's attack was in retaliation for the brutal murders of Cherokee hostages held at Fort Prince George. In 1762, Ostenaco was taken to England (at his insistence) by Henry Timberlake (1730-1765) and Thomas Sumter (1736-1832). Timberlake was a semi-official ambassador among the Cherokees, and Sumter was a soldier who later gained fame as the "Gamecock of the Revolution". While Ostenaco was in London, he was granted an hour and half audience with King George III. In the presence of the monarch, he began to prepare to smoke his pipe by taking out his tobacco. Timberlake spoke the Cherokee language and cautioned Ostenaco by pointing out that smoking in the king's palace would be disrespectful. While he was in London, Ostenaco also sat for his portrait by Reynolds. In about 1777, Ostenaco died peacefully and was survived by his half-breed grandson, Richard Timberlake. He was a child of Ostenaco's daughter and, in all probability, Henry Timberlake, who spent much time among the Cherokees.

W.T. Holland, M.S. of Bachelor's Retreat, is decidedly the tallest man in this part of the country—and some say he is the tallest fool, and others say he should not doctor a dog for them:--but he practices on, that is his business; he rides further and faster, and does more of it than any man now living, since Davy Crocket's dead. He treats cases as the symptoms appear; he pukes, he purges, he bleeds, he sweats, but don't steam at all, and cuts too; and seldom if ever, loses a patient while he or she continues breathing. He has a pill, a powder, a drop, a plaster for every pain, ache and ailment in the whole catalogue of human diseases, and will positively sell them lower by one-half, than any other person, white or black. He makes out his own bills and other men pay them, sometimes and sometimes they do not. They say he cannot collect by law, but I say, if he can't, be can-a-most.

June 9, 1849 [Parts are difficult to read]

(News from California. Copied from the Mobile Tribune). In some parts of Mexico whole towns were deserted by the men, who are rushing to California. Their wives and children were left to the tender mercies of the Indians. From Valparaiso and the adjacent parts there was the same onward rush to the golden land. Nearly all the merchants were preparing to emigrate. A weekly paper called the "Placer Times" is soon to be published at Sacramento. It is to give accurate information in relation to the mines. Sacramento has grown very rapidly and contains many handsome houses. Plans were on foot to establish a regular line of mails through California. In the port of San Francisco there were eighty vessels, which number was daily augmenting by new arrivals. The town of San Francisco was under great excitement which rose from rumors that were afloat that the military were paring to attack it, and that Gen. Smith had abolished all measures of safety taken by the legislature. The alcade and all the council of the town were displaced by justices of peace and police officers. The disorder which reigns in all branches of the administration is attributed to the conduct of the late governor Col. Mason. The reporter of the "Atta California," says he has seen a piece of gold found in the river Stanilaus, by a man of the name of Weber, weighing 78 ounces and valued at $1,248.

Recapture of Brown. We publish in another column the escape of Brown from the Sheriff of Kershaw District. Since that we are informed that he was recaptured shortly afterwards in the swamp near the place he made his escape. His handcuffs were still on—his leg badly broken, and he appeared to be in great pain.

*General Bee Was Mortally Wounded
During First Battle of Manassas*

By Charles H. Busha

Part Two

Later, Colonel Bee was sent to Winchester, Virginia, where he joined General Joseph Eggleston Johnson's Army of the Shenandoah. He was promoted to the rank of brigadier general on June 17, 1861, and placed in command of Johnston's 3rd Brigade. The green and inexperienced 2,882 volunteer troops of that brigade were members of the following Southern regiments: 4th Alabama Infantry, 2nd Mississippi Infantry, 11th Mississippi Infantry and 1st Tennessee Infantry. In addition, Virginia artillerymen, commanded by Captain John Daniel Imboden, were attached to General Bee's brigade. Another brigade in Johnston's army was the 1st Virginia Infantry, made up of men who were recruited in the Shenandoah and were commanded by General Thomas Jonathan Jackson (1824-1863). General Jackson (later better known as "Stonewall") was a religiously passionate military leader who graduated from West Point one year before General Bee's graduation there. In early July 1861, General Johnston appointed a South Carolinian who had the unusual name States Rights Gist (1831-1864) to be General Bee's aide-de-camp. (Earlier, Gist had served as both a brigadier general in the militia of the Palmetto State and as aide-de-camp to Governor James Hopkins Adams (1812-1861).) Prior to General Bee's arrival in Virginia, U. S. President Abraham Lincoln had made plans for the North to take the military initiative in the U. S. Civil War by attacking Richmond, Virginia, which is situated only 100 miles south of Washington, D. C., the Union's capital. Lincoln had already selected General Irwin McDowell to organize and train a Union army for his planned preemptive aggression against the South. For months, General McDowell was busy training his soldiers in Washington for an "on-to-Richmond" advance. Meanwhile, Confederate President Jefferson Davis was taking measures at Richmond to strengthen the South's defensive positions in northern Virginia in anticipation of a possible attack by Northern forces. On July 16, 1861, Brigadier General McDowell, the Federal military leader who was not very popular because of his gruff and galling personality, led his 37,000 troops out of Washington, and they began a slow, thirty-mile long southwesterly march to Manassas, Virginia. The army's ultimate mission was to overwhelm Richmond, capital of the Confederacy, thereby suppressing the South's rebellion. Two days later, General Johnston, who was with his troops in the lower Shenandoah Valley, was ordered by President

Davis to move his 11,000-man army eastward sixty miles to Manassas Junction, in order to bolster the strength of General Pierre G. T. Beauregard's army that was expecting a Union attack. Johnston quickly assembled troops of three of his four brigades, put them aboard railway cars of the Manassas Gap Railroad and transported them to Manassas Junction. The troops arrived there on July 20th. The three transported brigades were commanded by Generals Bee and Thomas J. Jackson and Col. F. S. Bartow. Johnston's deployment of troops on a public railway and directly to what would soon be a battlefield was a first such occurrence in American military history.

Once General Bee's 3rd Brigade reached Manassas Junction, it was ordered to occupy the left line of defense along Bull Run Creek. Bee was not pleased with that placement of his troops: He assumed that an attack would initially take place on the right of the defensive line. Thus, he wanted to be in the thick of action at what would likely become the first major land battle of the Civil War. Both brigades commanded by Bee and Colonel Bartow were of Warrenton Turnpike. After Johnston's arrival at Manassas Junction, the general was placed in command of all 32,000 troops there, and General Beauregard was second in command. Even though Johnston outranked Beauregard and was known to be obsessed with rank, he allowed his subordinate to prepare a complex plan of battle, based on a prediction that Federal troops would first make an assault on the Confederates' right.

When Barnard E. Bee was placed in command of the 3rd brigade of General Johnston's army and promoted to the rank of brigadier general, he was thirty-seven years of age. He had already obtained considerable active combat experience during the Mexican-American War. Standing six feet tall, the muscular officer was an imposing, fine-looking and intelligent leader of troops. The general was also noted for his honesty and fine character. Although General Bee was anxious to take part in the brewing first great battle of the U. S. Civil War, he was very disappointed that his brigade had been position on the left of the Confederates' defensive line at Bull Run Creek, rather on the right where Generals Johnston and Beauregard believed that the Union's initial assault would take place.

3rd Brigade Commander, Army of the Shenandoah*

On the morning of July 21, 1861, Captain John Daniel Imboden, General Bee's artillery officer, was in the process of positioning the brigade's four smooth-bore artillery guns on the defensive line. He received information that advancing Union troops had been spotted across Bull Run Creek on the Confederate's left. He then reported that fact to General Bee, who rushed anxiously to a nearby hilltop to obtain a better view of the area across the creek. There, he could plainly see many of the bayonets carried by enemy soldiers as their weapons glittered in the bright sunlight. Bee's disappointment about the placement of the brigade's 1,300 troops quickly turned to jubilation and elation; the eager officer realized that he could soon be in the thick of action. Shortly thereafter, Union General McDowell ordered his troops to begin their initial assault across Bull Run Creek where the Confederates had least expected an attack. Tens of thousands of Federal troops then attempted to go around the Confederates' left line and to crush its rear.

Colonel Nathan George Evans, a native of Marion, South Carolina, and a graduate of West Point, commanded a brigade during the First Battle of Bull Run. Evans and his forces were initially positioned at the Stone Bridge across Warrenton Turnpike, and he discerned early on that the Union army was attempting a movement around the Confederate flank. General Evans and his troops, including Colonel John Baylis Earl Sloan's 4th South Carolina Infantry, met the Union army's attempt to maneuver around the flank, allowing Generals Johnston and Beauregard time to shift enough forces from the right to stop the enemy's attack. General Bee's troops quickly came to the aid of Evans' brigade. But the defenses at Matthews Hill soon fell to overwhelming Union forces. General Bee's brigade was also forced to retreat about a mile and a half to the south where it took up positions at the base of Henry House Hill. Then, General Thomas Jonathan Jackson's brigade arrived on the same high eminence and took protective cover on its reverse side. The Federals continued their close pursuit of Confederate forces, and, despite having lost about all of his brigade's field officers, General Bee made every attempt to rally his broken forces until General Jackson counterattacked and was aided by newly arrived Confederate reinforcements.

Fourth Sergeant John Henry Etheridge, a Confederate soldier who served as a member of Company "E", 7th South Carolina Infantry, prepared an eyewitness written account of the battle. In his account, the sergeant referred to Southern troops as the "gray" and the Northern troops as the "blue", based on the colors of many of their respective uniforms. Provided below in a boxed-in section is part of Sergeant Ethridge's reminiscence of a key juncture of the fierce and confusing battle.

About noon we could see individuals in gray, their squads of three or four, then whole companies being pressed back by [General] McDowell's overwhelming numbers. We could see them slowly and sullenly dropping back, loading their muskets as they came, then wheeling in their tracks and firing a volley into the canopy of smoke in which we could see dimly the long outline of the heavy line of blue pressing hard upon the retreating gray. Soon many of the gray were pushed down the declivity into the [Bull Run] creek, while a long way to our left I could see retreating Confederates rushing across the stone bridge and others wading the creek. Near the stone bridge I could hear the command of the officers, "Steady, boys, Steady! Face about!" Gen. Bonham and Gen. Bee were dashing up and down before the retreating line calling, "Steady, boys!"

Steady!" I saw the gray begin to rally and stand firm; then again saw the overwhelming oncoming rush of the blue. Again the gray wavered and began to fall. At this critical point a loud and tumultuous yell was heard in the rear and a report rapidly spread along the lines that reinforcements were coming. Gen. Bee dashed out among his soldiers, waving his sabre, and I could hear the words, "Rally! Rally! See the Virginians standing there and see [General] Jackson like a stone wall!" Gen. Bee and Gen. Bonham rode up to Jackson and exclaimed, "General, the day is against us; all is lost." Jackson returned, "Rally, men, fix bayonets, order the charge. We will give them cold steel!" At this moment, reinforcements came up and there indeed we saw a fearful sight. The lines were reformed, heaving reinforcements thrown in and a wild countercharge was made. I could see the flashing of the sabre, the thrust of the bayonet, the striking of the clubbed gun and the heavy mass of the blue began to waiver and retreat. A wild yell went up. Other reinforcements were thrown in and it was but a short time before the lines of the blue in our front were hurled back across the creek in utter rout and the enemy's centre was pierced and broken. After driving them beyond their original position, our men dropped into the breastworks which had been occupied by the Federal troops in the morning. Here for some time the battle was fast and furious but stationary. While our regiment was intended as a reserve, still, when the advancing soldiers came on, we were hotly engaged. Our regiment was intrenched along the banks of Bull Run and parallel with it and distant from the stream about one hundred fifty yards.

Shortly after having bestowed the sobriquet "Stonewall" on Confederate General Thomas J. Jackson, General Bee was mortally wounded while leading his troops in battle. He died the next day (on July 22, 1861). His body was then returned to South Carolina and buried at St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Pendleton. Today, General Bee is chiefly remembered for having given Stonewall Jackson his well-known nickname. Unfortunately, Bee's more significant contribution to the Confederate victory at Bull Run has been obscured by that accidental development. Had the life of this very capable and dedicated military leader not been cut so short during the first great battle of the Civil War, Bee would probably have risen high among the ranks of his fellow Confederate generals.
